READING A · KEEPING LOCAL CRAFTS ALIVE

At the edge of An Hoa, a small town known for bamboo products, there is a street that becomes a craft market every Saturday. For many years, local artisans sold baskets only to nearby shops. When online orders started to grow, some of them worried that traditional techniques would disappear because young people preferred factory jobs.

Last autumn, the town council invited experienced artisans to run short workshops for students. The workshops are free, but visitors pay a small amount if they take home a product they make. The council also closed the street to cars during market hours after residents complained about noise and traffic. Teen volunteers now guide visitors and show them where to put rubbish. They also help older craftspeople post photos of their products online.

Fourteen-year-old Linh first joined because her teacher encouraged her. She expected the work to be boring, but she enjoyed learning how to weave a small basket. “I used to think these skills belonged only to the past,” she said. “Now I see that they can bring people together.” The project has increased interest in local crafts, although organisers are still trying to make workshops affordable while paying artisans fairly.

READING B · SMALL STEPS, HEALTHIER STUDENTS

During exam periods, some teenagers believe the only way to improve grades is to study for more hours. However, teachers at Green Hill School noticed that students who slept too little often struggled to concentrate. To explore simple ways to help, they invited 60 volunteers to join a four-week Healthy Habits Challenge.

Each student chose two habits to improve. Some put their phones away half an hour before bed; others took short walks after school or planned their homework in smaller tasks. Every student kept a short diary, recording their bedtime and how energetic they felt the next day. The school did not ask them to buy special food or pay for exercise classes.

At the end of the programme, most students said they felt more prepared for lessons, but not everyone reported better test results. The teachers warned families against expecting instant changes. They said healthy habits need time and regular practice. One participant, Huy, said, “I still have difficult days, but now I know what to do before I feel overwhelmed.”
